While many affected workers may seek employment services at one-stop centers, relatively few enroll in training, according to the results of our study of five layoffs. Seventy-percent or more of the workers in our study visited a one-stop center, often receiving one-on-one assistance. In our most recent study, we found that, nationally, occupational training remains the largest training category for TAA participants, with about three-fourths of TAA training participants opting for occupational training. States ranked nursing - including registered nurses, licensed practical nurses, and certified vocational nurses - medical assisting, and truck driving as the occupations in which TAA participants were most frequently trained. Although occupational training remains the largest training...
