Excerpt: .which he is able thus to carry in mind the thought of distant or remote events, persons, and places, we call imagination.1 Through imagination present institutions can be explained by reference to their history. The school, for example, has certain peculiar characteristics. The division of the school period into eight years for the elementary school, four years for the high school, and four years for the college, has a definite historical background. The methods of study which are pursued, the subjects which are included in the curriculum, and a variety of other matters, are to be explained by reference to more or less remote past events. Imagination connects our immediate life with events taking place in distant parts of the earth. For the explanation of many of the events which we observe to be going on about us, we must be able to create in our imagination persons and things which exist in the present time, but in remote places on the earth. As this is being written, much of the conduct of residents in the United States is governed by the war which is being waged in Europe. We are continually creating in imagination the scenes of the European conflict and considering its bearing on our lives. The world has come to be so much of a unit through means of transportation and communication that the use of geography is an everyday affair. 1 Imagination is the mental process by which experience is...
