Not illustrated. 1875 Excerpt: . while it lasts, and yet it is quite enough to give a distinct impression in the eye. This may be well shown by artificial lightning. Thus if we charge a Leyden jar by help of the electrical machine, place near it a wheel in rapid motion, the room being darkened, and then make the electrical discharge, we shall see the wheel quite stationary and sharply defined. The duration of the flash is so short as to be estimated with the greatest difficulty. Although the impression be made thus quietly, it endures for some time. If we use the revolving disc with the slit, and look through it at some well-illuminated object, the successive views are perceptible when the disc turns slowly. When its speed is increased the impressions become more nearly continuous, and at a certain rate we fail to notice any interruption, that is to say the impression made on the eye at one passage of the slit continues until the slit come round again. It is generally stated that the impression from an ordinarily well-illuminated object lasts for one-tenth part of a second; that from a bright flame or from the sun lasts much longer. If we look at a moving body through the rapidly revolving slit we see as it were a succession of bodies placed at equal intervals, the interval being the distance through which the body has moved during one turn of the disc. In the case of an animal,...
